

Fads and Fashions

By Florence Fairbanks

NEW YORK, January 22.—Lady Fashion has once more proved her whimsicality by making a leap and landing in Russia. A perfect craze for things Russian seems to have broken out and Russian styles predominate to a startling degree in women's fashions. Furs, velvets, barbaric jewels, bold embroideries and other characteristic Russian trimmings and ornamentations predominate, and Tolstoi smocks, czarevitch tunics, Cossack hats towering aloft and mujik turbans ensnathing the ears are features of midwinter styles.

The most notable feature of this Russian dress mode is the tunic. Everywhere the tunic predominates. It is of chiffon, of cloth of gold or silver, of jotted or beaded gauze, or net, or satin and falls over frocks of every imaginable material. Most of the evening costumes at the opera and in the theater show tunics of one sort or another, dozens of variations being effected by the dressmakers in the long, clinging tunic lines.

One of the most striking dress features of the present season in New York is the velvet blouse bordered all around with fur and belted at the waist line. According to Russian notions a tunic, belted in at the waist, becomes a blouse, no matter what its length. Some of the Russian blouses fall quite to the knees; others extend only a few inches below the belt; but below the belt they always do extend, for the bodice and skirt combination has no place in Russian consideration.

The velvet blouses with fur borders so fashionable just now are supposed to imitate the peasant smock affected by Tolstoi and fasten down one side of the front in the Russian fashion, with baggy lines and broad shoulders extending into the sleeves. The fur border goes all around the bottom and runs up the edge of the side fastening and around the wrists of the sleeves and is usually the fashionable saunk. Those blouses may or may not be worn over velvet skirts, but the skirt, of whatever material, is always in the same color as the velvet blouse coat. Sometimes these blouses are worn over little afternoon tea frocks of cashmere or soie or permo stuff. Chiffon blouses or tunics in the style of those worn by the little czarevitch, Alexis, are worn over wool and permo dresses, though, of course, these chiffon affairs do not serve as coats, as do the velvet blouses. They are cut in true Russian style, with sleeves all in one with the body of the garment and no arm seams. The neck is cut out in a square, or straight across from shoulder to shoulder in the Russian fashion, and is finished with a band of Russian embroidery which continues down the side fastening. A belt of the embroidery combined with leather gives a snappy finish to the czarevitch tunic.

Directly traceable to Russian influence is the abbreviated "skating costume" type of dress seen now on the streets. The jaunty short skirts, bordered with fur, are American adaptations of skating costumes worn on the Neva during the gay St. Petersburg winter season. Usually these Russian skating suits are of velvet and the fur border is of skunk. A huge muff and tricorn of fur complete this fetching winter costume. It is scarcely necessary to remark that this style of costume is appropriate and becoming only to young and girlish figures and should be avoided by all elderly women, especially those of generous proportions.

The Russian dress is usually of slightly lowered neck line and abbreviated sleeve, showing from beneath a contrasting yoke and cuff, which was originally connected with the undergarment. In some of the really exquisite models, following closely their originals, the underskirts and whole under bodice are of a delicate material, over which is worn the blouse, with its belt and long tunic reaching almost to the hem of the dress proper. Handsome afternoon gowns follow this idea, their undergarment being, for instance, some rich, dark mulberry satin, with Russian tunic and blouse of coarse black silk not embroidered in mulberry tones in band effect.

The spread of the Russian craze has brought back the belt to popularity. Deep toned embroideries are combined with red or black leather and wonderful clasps of beaten gold and silver, and these new Russian belts are a conspicuous item of the costume, for they are extremely wide, ranging from three to six inches across. Jewels and enamels belong to the Russian girdle, from the clasp at the yoke line to the curious fastenings used down the side front. Dark metals, looking like oxidized silver and old iron, are mingled in jeweled clasps for the back and front of loose-fitting girdles. A barbaric ornament of dull silver or gold, set with enamel or colored stones is the buckle most worn.

Among the many reasons which explain the popularity of ermine this winter is the remarkable vogue for black and white. Black, of course, is always dignified, and there goes with it an air of refinement which supplies the charm striven for by all women. But when a touch of white is added, either as fur, lace or tulle, there is a certain relief which gives an all-round satisfaction. This combination distinguishes many costumes for day and evening wear. It is always in good taste and generally very becoming.

It is reported that Paris has been conquered by the separate blouse and when one considers the newest models, whether they be of linen, chalis or lace and chiffon, there is little doubt concerning their justified claims. They are so eminently convenient that American women have always clung to those friendly adjuncts to morning and afternoon toilettes, and the sanction of the French will undoubtedly increase their popularity.

It is rumored that in Paris the fashionable dance frock, which has proved even more acceptable and convenient than was anticipated, will grow shorter as the season advances. While this rage for the sensibly abbreviated skirt has not extended to the reception gown nor the at home frock, it has penetrated in among such stuffs as rose petals and rainbows are made of. No material, no matter how diaphanous, need be reserved for the long reception gown; short frocks demand all the elegance of the season. The debutante's dresses are more beautiful than ever. Silver has touched her white frock and rested there so persistently that the combination has almost become a uniform. White satin, pure and simple, has declined in favor. It is now draped with the inevitable silver gauze, and again the same moonlight effect is produced by silver tulle over crepe meteor.

A favorite hat for afternoon wear is a combination of tulle and fur, with a huge aigrette as trimming. Indeed, the hats are amenable to the latest treatment which may suggest itself to the mind of the great designers. Cream colored velvet for the full crown of a fur brim. A certain relief from the dark colors so popular is thus given, but the band of skunk very cleverly keeps the trying white away from the face.

Jeweled, studded and carved pins are at present seen on the heads of nearly every woman who wears a braid; and nearly every woman does. They are very pretty, though expensive, as a matter of course.

ACTIVE ELDERLY MEN OVER FORTY

Appear to Hold Efficiency to Much Greater Age

The activity and good health of the man over forty is one of the features of the present day.

"Undoubtedly," observed a member of the Royal Statistical society, "elderly people appear to maintain what one may call a greater efficiency than they did years ago. I think this is largely due to the great growth in medical skill and also to the fact that people particularly those in responsible position—study their physical fitness far more than used to be the case. The man of 45 or 50 appears today, by careful dieting, golf and healthy exercise, generally, to keep himself far more alert than his father or grandfather at a similar age."

"My view," said the middle-aged head of a prominent city firm, "is that the men in the city preserve their efficiency nowadays far longer than they used to do. I know old men, as you may call them, who still bear upon their shoulders the responsibility of some big concern. Years ago they would have been sitting at home in their slippers at such an age."

"Elderly men study their appearance far more than they used to do," said the manager of a city bank. "They wear collars and ties and styles in dress which make them look smart and youthful." From my experience it certainly seems that the elderly man is very loath to leave the scene of his activities now. I put it down to ours being an abstemious age. Directly a man has a small ailment he goes straight to his physician. What the medical man tells him to do he does exactly. His one desire is to keep fit, and he manages to do so."—London Daily Mail.

Had Tried Hot Water

A buxom colored sister once approached her pastor and said: "Brudder Johasing, me and my ole man don't agree at all. We is all the time quarrelin'. Will you oblige me wid some advice?"

The pastor replied: "Sister Jackson, has you tried hempin' coals of fire on his head?"

She then exclaimed: "No, Brudder Johasing, but I've tried hot water."

ABSENT AMERICANS HAVE BIG INCOMES

It is reckoned that this country must send abroad nearly $600,000,000 a year as interest on debts and dowries, for tourist expenses and in immigrants' remittances. So there was a shortage last year of about $225,000,000 and of $380,000,000 in nine months this year. By fresh borrowing the interest payment has thus increased in two years by some $24,000,000. The extensive customhouse frauds make it likely that even this vast shortage is understated.

To pay interest upon the dowries of six American women, 20,000,000 pounds of cotton must cross the sea this year. To pay the rentals of one absentee landlord of New York will take 5,000,000 bushels of wheat. Tourists' and health seekers' trips help the country by promoting trade abroad and bringing back information; but when to the growth of extravagance and to the waste of an artificially heightened cost of living is added the burden of supporting "American colonies" in European capitals, the balance of trade is affected with no corresponding advantage.—New York World.
